

the standard model of examination security assumes that custody of printed material can be audited after the fact through physical seals and human testimony alone this assumption fails precisely when the custodian is complicit because the seal reports only that the packet was opened not who photographed the contents once opened a forensic fingerprint embedded in the printed page itself shifts the evidentiary basis from testimony to signal each copy carries an invisible codeword drawn from a collusion resistant code so